Not illustrated. 1850 Excerpt: .and in the general tone and temper of the education of boys, great improvements have in recent years been introduced in most of our Great Schools: and I would beg the eminent scholars who direct the education of these Schools to believe that all which I say is said with the most entire respect for them, and with great admiration of the manner in which they discharge and elevate their office, so far as I am acquainted with the cases. They will, I am sure, see nothing but a fair discussion of an important subject about which we are all deeply interested, in any attempt to consider of what elements the education of a Great School ought to consist, and how these may be introduced into their places. I must treat the subject in a general manner; not only because such is the most proper mode of dealing with it, but because I really have not, in my mind, any reference to one particular place or mode of practice rather than another, amongst those which now exist. 365 After what I have already said, my readers will not be surprised at my again saying that the Mathematics ought to be taught at school, so far as to be a preparation for the Mathematics which are to be studied at the University; nor at my adding that P12 II. F the present Mathematical teaching at several of our Great Schools fails of satisfying this condition with regard...
